Thanks Chrissie, I know you're stalking me and will just lie about it Federal Court, you know perjury is enforced in Federal Court, min 5 years, I think, anyway, thanks for all of your hard work of abusing me and harassing me cause I'm a Scientologist and you're a religious hater

Kathy Gold @adventuresofkg · Sep 4

So if you have racist or religious haters abusing/harrassing your children or friends, family etc etc, just have them do their due diligence and go to court to collect. In the end, all these people's assets can be confiscated to pay for my fees of evidence gathering etc etc

To all law enforcement on the line, this Chrissie psycho Scientology religious hater is so correct, I'm so money, the evidence I'm gathering is gonna cost $300.00 an hour or whatever the going rate is, cause I gotta do everybody's job and I'm the victim/plantiff LMAO or cha ching

The cult denying they are homophobic is laughable.

On every critics story they DENY DENY DENY.

They do not fool those who were in.

Many Gays paid over $100,000 for confessionals to UN-GAY them. It never worked. I eyewitnessed their intense homophobia.

America is about FREEDOM.
Freedom to live your life as you please.

It's only when people FORCE their ways on others

Creating new policies together

The Twitter Rules

(https://blog.twitter.com/official/en\_us/topics/company/2018/TheTwitterRulesALivingDocument.html)

apply to everyone who uses Twitter. In the past, we've created our rules with a rigorous policy development process (<https://help.twitter.com/en/rules-and-policies/enforcement-philosophy>); it involves in-depth research and partnership with the members of our Trust and Safety Council (https://about.twitter.com/en\_us/safety/safety-partners.html) and other experts to ensure these policies best serve every person on the service. Now, we're trying something new by asking everyone for feedback on a policy before it's part of the Twitter Rules.

For the last three months, we have been developing a new policy to address dehumanizing language on Twitter. Language that makes someone less than human can have repercussions off the service, including normalizing serious violence. Some of this content falls within our hateful conduct policy (<https://help.twitter.com/en/rules-and-policies/hateful-conduct-policy>) (which prohibits the promotion of violence against or direct attacks or threats against other people on the basis of race, ethnicity, national origin, sexual orientation, gender, gender identity, religious affiliation, age, disability, or serious disease), but there are still Tweets many people consider to be abusive, even when they do not break our rules. Better addressing this gap is part of our work to serve a healthy public conversation

(https://blog.twitter.com/official/en\_us/topics/product/2018/Serving\_Healthy\_Conversation.html).

With this change, we want to expand our hateful conduct policy to include content that dehumanizes others based on their membership in an identifiable group, even when the material does not include a direct target. Many scholars have examined the relationship between dehumanization and violence. For example, Susan Benesch (<https://dangerousspeech.org/the-dangerous-speech-project-preventing-mass-violence/>) has described dehumanizing language as a hallmark of dangerous speech, because it can make violence seem acceptable, and Herbert Kelman (<https://scholar.harvard.edu/hckelman/publications/violence-without-moral-restraint-reflections-dehumanization-victims-and-victim>) has posited that dehumanization can reduce the strength of restraining forces against violence.

We want your feedback to ensure we consider global perspectives and how this policy may impact different communities and cultures. For languages not represented here, our policy team is working closely with local non-governmental organizations and policy makers to ensure their perspectives are captured.

Below you'll find a quick survey, which will be available until Tuesday, October 9, at 6:00am PST. Once the feedback form has closed, we will continue with our regular process (https://blog.twitter.com/official/en\_us/topics/company/2017/HowPolicyChangesWork.html), which passes through a cross-functional working group, including members of our policy development, user research, engineering, and enforcement teams. We will share some of what we learn when we update the Twitter Rules later this year.

This is part of our singular effort to increase the health of the public conversation on our service and we hope this gives you a better understanding of how new rules are created. We want you to be part of this process, let us know what you think in the form below.

Twitter's Dehumanization Policy

You may not dehumanize anyone based on membership in an identifiable group, as this speech can lead to offline harm.

Definitions:

Dehumanization: Language that treats others as less than human. Dehumanization can occur when others are denied of human qualities (animalistic dehumanization) or when others are denied of human nature (mechanistic dehumanization). Examples can include comparing groups to animals and viruses (animalistic), or reducing groups to their genitalia (mechanistic).

Identifiable group: Any group of people that can be distinguished by their shared characteristics such as their race, ethnicity, national origin, sexual orientation, gender, gender identity, religious affiliation, age, disability, serious disease, occupation, political beliefs, location, or social practices.

On a scale of 1 to 5, how would you rate the clarity of the dehumanization policy provided, where 1 is 'Not at all clear' and 5 is 'Extremely Clear.'

Enforcing New Rules to Reduce Hateful Conduct and Abusive Behavior

By Twitter Safety (https://blog.twitter.com/official/en\_us/authors.twittersafety.html)

Monday, 18 December 2017

Today, we will start enforcing updates to the Twitter Rules announced (<https://twitter.com/TwitterSafety/status/931552531167166469>) last month to reduce hateful and abusive content on Twitter. Through our policy development process (https://blog.twitter.com/official/en\_us/topics/company/2017/HowPolicyChangesWork.html), we've taken a collaborative approach to develop and implement these changes, including working in close coordination with experts on our Trust and Safety Council (https://about.twitter.com/en\_us/safety/safety-partners.html).

New Policies

New Rules on Violence and Physical Harm

Specific threats of violence or wishing for serious physical harm, death, or disease to an individual or group of people is in violation of our policies. Our new changes include more types of related content including:

- Accounts that affiliate with organizations that use or promote violence against civilians to further their causes. Groups included in this policy (<https://help.twitter.com/rules-and-policies/violent-groups>) will be those that identify as such or engage in activity — both on and off the platform — that promotes violence. This policy does not apply to military or government entities and we will consider exceptions for groups that are currently engaging in (or have engaged in) peaceful resolution.
- Content that glorifies violence or the perpetrators of a violent act (<https://help.twitter.com/rules-and-policies/violent-threats-glorification>). This includes celebrating any violent act in a manner that may inspire others to replicate it or any violence where people were targeted because of their membership in a protected group. We will require offending Tweets to be removed and repeated violations will result in permanent suspension.

Expanding our Rules to Include Related Content

Our hateful conduct policy (<https://help.twitter.com/en/rules-and-policies/hateful-conduct-policy>) and rules (<https://help.twitter.com/en/rules-and-policies/twitter-rules>) against abusive behavior prohibit promoting violence against or directly attacking or threatening other people on the basis of their group characteristics, as well as engaging in abusive behavior that harasses, intimidates, or uses fear to silence another person's voice. We are broadening these policies to include additional types of related content and conduct including:

- Any account that abuses or threatens others through their profile information (<https://help.twitter.com/rules-and-policies/abusive-profile>), including their username, display name, or profile bio. If an account's profile information includes a violent threat or multiple slurs, epithets, racist or sexist tropes, incites fear, or reduces someone to less than human, it will be permanently suspended. We plan to develop internal tools to help us identify violating accounts to supplement user reports.
- Hateful imagery will now be considered sensitive media under our media policy (<https://help.twitter.com/en/rules-and-policies/media-policy>). We consider hateful imagery to be logos, symbols, or images whose purpose is to promote hostility and malice against others based on their race, religion, disability, sexual orientation, or ethnicity/national origin. If this type of content appears in header or profile images, we will now accept profile-level reports and require account owners to remove any violating media.

What's Next

Today, we are starting to enforce these policies across Twitter. In our efforts to be more aggressive here, we may make some mistakes and are working on a robust appeals process. We'll evaluate and iterate on these changes in the coming days and weeks, and will keep you posted on progress along the way.

We're making these changes to create a safer environment for everyone. You can follow our ongoing work and other safety updates @TwitterSafety.

Hello,

We're writing to let you know that your account features will remain locked or limited for the allotted time due to violations of the Twitter Rules, specifically our hateful conduct policy.

We do not allow people to promote violence against or directly attack or threaten other people on the basis of race, ethnicity, national origin, sexual orientation, gender, gender identity, religious affiliation, age, disability, or disease.

Please note that continued abusive behavior may lead to the suspension of your account. To avoid having your account suspended, please only post content that abides by the Twitter Rules: <https://twitter.com/rules#hateful-conduct>.

You can learn more about our policy against hateful conduct here: <https://help.twitter.com/rules-and-policies/hateful-conduct-policy>.

HOW TWITTER'S NEW SAFETY POLICIES ARE CREATED

trying to curb the sexism and racism that users—especially minority groups—have complained about for years. The social media company develops new rules regularly, but this time it's doing something different: asking the public what it thinks. For the next two weeks, anyone can answer Twitter's form asking for feedback about whether the new policy is clear and how it might be improved.

This week, WIRED spoke with Del Harvey, Twitter's long-standing vice president of trust and safety, about why the company is changing its approach to dehumanizing speech. For more than a decade, Harvey has been Twitter's go-to person when it comes to spam, abuse, threats of violence, and trolls. When she first started at Twitter in 2008—as employee No. 25—Harvey was the only person working in the trust and safety department. Now she leads the team that helps decide where the line is between free speech and dangerous harassment on one of the world's largest social media platforms. Here are her thoughts on Trump, trolls, and the company's new focus on safety.

Louise Matsakis: I'm curious about why you wanted to solicit public feedback on the dehumanizing speech policy. This is the first time to my knowledge, and please correct me if I'm wrong, in Twitter's history that you have done this. So why now? Why ask people what they think about a policy like this?

Del Harvey: There are a whole bunch of reasons why we're asking the public. One of the biggest ones is that historically, we have been less transparent than, quite frankly, I think is ideal about our policies and how we develop them, the principles that guide their development. Our hope is that actually having this feedback period will serve to bring people sort of along with us on the process. We obviously have historically solicited feedback from various NGOs in a given space or the subject matter experts on the Trust and Safety Council, or different regional groups, but even with that, there is very much always the possibility that we could miss something, that something wouldn't get raised. What's really the goal is trying to make sure that we are being thoughtful and that we do really try to capture all the possible variances that we might not think of inherently when we are coming up with these policies. We do really hope that the public feedback period might actually help us with that. This is the first

Louise Matsakis: Is there a specific region or specific type of feedback that you're looking for? Is it fair to say that you're looking for things you haven't thought of or that your partners haven't thought of in this?

Del Harvey: I mean, actually, I feel like it's kind of helpful to know whether people think, "Yeah, it sounds like you've got this covered." Not just "Here's something you haven't thought of," but having a better understanding of what are people's expectations in this space. Does this match with what people think should be the policy? Do they feel like this is even fair? Where do they think the line should be? That's more than just "Oh, you missed something about this." If we find that there's a major disconnect, then it gives us an opportunity to figure out how can we do more around education. How can we do more around communication in this space? What can we do to try to proactively make sure people understand where we're coming with this and why we ended up where we did?

Louise Matsakis: Right, so it's two parts. It's the policy itself, but also making sure that the policy is communicated and people understand. I know that this is building upon the hateful conduct policy, which already exists. It's going from it being a specific attack against an individual to now, when this policy is in place, it will protect against attacks that target an entire group. Is that the way you're thinking about it?

Del Harvey: To give a slight tweak on that, it's actually around whether or not it's actually targeted at someone. So, for example, if you sent me an @ reply that said, "All lesbians are scum and should die," even though that didn't say you are scum and you should die, that would still be a violation of our hateful conduct policy today. But if it was tweeted not to me, that would be a potential violation of this new dehumanization policy that we're talking about. It's taking away the requirement that an individual who is potentially a member of the protected group being discussed be referenced in the tweet itself.

Louise Matsakis: How did you guys come up with this policy in the first place? I know that in August, when there was a debate about whether to remove Alex Jones, it came to light that you were working on this policy and you were choosing to expedite it. Why is it important that Twitter have something like this in place sooner rather than later?

Del Harvey: I think the reason for the policy is really as we look at behavior on the platform and try to identify where there are behaviors that are problematic, and especially when they potentially could lead to real-world harm, if they are not covered by our policies, then it's something we want to try to figure out. Should they be covered by our policies? Generally speaking, my view is that if there is a behavior that is likely to result in real-world harm we really should be looking at what are the guardrails around something like that. How can we do a good job of making sure that we are taking our role seriously in terms of trying to protect people?

Part of the reason I think we're talking about this now is we've made a lot of changes over the last couple of years to really improve our enforcement options past just suspension. Some time ago, you were suspended or you were not suspended. That was pretty much all we had. We've tried to add a lot of new enforcement options. Now that we have some of those additional options, and now that we're working on developing more, it gives us the opportunity to really dig into some areas that were maybe grey areas in the past that we didn't have policy coverage for.

We obviously get reports from people about content that they believe violates our rules that does not. The dehumanizing content and the dehumanizing behavior is one of the areas that really makes up a significant chunk of those reports. We've gotten feedback not just in terms of the research that's out there about potential real-world harms, we've gotten feedback from the people who use Twitter about this being something they view as deeply problematic. All of those things add together to say we should absolutely be trying to make sure we aren't limiting how we think about our policies to just those that are dealing with whether an individual was specifically referenced.

Louise Matsakis: In the future, how will the dehumanizing speech policy work in tandem with other policies that Twitter is working on? I know that you are looking at a policy for off-platform behavior, for example. That would potentially take into account someone's behavior off Twitter when considering enforcement options.

Del Harvey: We have added new enforcement options, but we absolutely still need to develop more nuanced and tailored approaches to certain violations, which would include whether or not we would want potentially to factor in off-platform behavior when evaluating a specific violation.

One of the other pieces that goes along with all of this is trying to think about how we can provide both proactive and just-in-time checkpoints. If somebody is about to do something, it seems as though they're headed down a bad path, how can we intervene to try to educate, or if they had already done that violation, to rehabilitate people?

We can come up with policies all day long. But unless we come up with a way of communicating them to people better and making sure that they understand what our rules are, what behavior violates them, what the consequences are of that violation, what to expect from us—unless people really understand those things, our policies are going to be not enough. They're not really going to be a factor if people don't understand they exist in the first place. We are actually working on how we can completely overhaul the Twitter Rules to try to make them more accessible and transparent.

Louise Matsakis: Beyond just overhauling the policies themselves, one thing I have been thinking about a lot is the actual interface, the way that Twitter works and the way that tweets work. Have you thought about things like news organizations embedding tweets, quote tweeting, or taking threads out of context? These are aspects of how Twitter works, and sometimes they end up amplifying abuse. Along with the rules, are you guys thinking about the actual way the platform functions and whether changes need to be made to keep people safer than they have been in the past?

Del Harvey: Yeah, absolutely. I think that one of the challenges that you just referenced here that is incredibly relevant is the challenge of context collapse. When you see a single tweet quoted out of context of whatever the rest of the conversation was, that is almost a perfect example of an opportunity for context collapse. One of the things that Jack [Dorsey, Twitter's CEO] has actually referenced is that we need to figure out what are the incentives that we have built into the product? How do we need to revisit those or reframe those to actually encourage and help people understand what healthy public conversation is, as opposed to incentivizing bad behaviors?

One other piece that I think that really factors in here is that we also want to try to do more to provide meaningful transparency around our rules and processes and enforcement. How can we make sure people understand when enforcement actions have been taken? If you actually have no clue that we took an enforcement action, even if we shifted how the product works, you may just do some other variation of it without realizing what the reason was behind it.

Louise Matsakis: What about adding labels, like a label that says for example, "This is part of a thread." Would you guys ever consider a label like that to bring back some of that context into the discussion?

Del Harvey: Totally. You could envision there being something like "Click here to view the thread." There's a whole bunch of different sort of in-product things we can explore in that space. But I think conversations like this, or suggestions like this, is actually sort of indicative of why we are trying to do more in terms of doing public comment periods, or soliciting feedback from a broader set of people than just the standard group because there are so many different needs that people have. We really do want to serve the health of the public conversation. We want to make sure that people can express themselves freely on Twitter and feel safe doing so.

Louise Matsakis: With the context collapse you're talking about, and everyone having their own experience, I wonder about how Twitter is dealing with being a global platform where there are so many different voices and different languages. Some of the most horrific consequences of the rise of these platforms, like Twitter and Facebook, have unfolded in the parts of the world that are the furthest from the United States. How are you thinking about the dehumanization policy and other policies in a global context?

Del Harvey: It's something I spend a lot of time thinking about. We've always tried to develop policies with a global mindset, but to have an understanding of the cultural nuances and the cultural context of how those policies actually impact people, we have historically talked to the members of the Trust and Safety Council. We also have a public policy team that works with various NGOs and groups that work on issues related to human rights and the protections that people really need. We work really closely with them as well through the policy development process. I think it's pretty unlikely that people generally have any clue that we do proactive outreach to try to understand how our given policies might impact a given region.

It's incredibly important that we think about this not just on a regional basis, but also the different groups who use Twitter to make sure that we understand the potential consequences there, too. It's tremendously important, because even looking at something like the way that men tend to experience abuse online versus the way that women tend to experience abuse online, you see huge differences. That's why making sure that we are actually getting feedback from people who have lived that is so important.

Louise Matsakis: That's really important work and it's also really resource-intensive. Over the last year, it seems publicly that Twitter has shifted its focus to really prioritizing safety. Do you feel like that prioritization is reflected internally? Have you been able to make more hires, has your team gotten more preference or priority inside the company?

Del Harvey: I think the biggest shift is that we have really broadened the teams that actually work on these issues. Some years ago, there was sort of this [attitude] of "we'll just handle this with policies." You can't just handle this with policies. It has to be a cross-functional effort. There has to be product involvement, you have to have research involved, you need design involved. You need all of the different stakeholders to be part of the conversation because that shift means you can really start unlocking things that weren't even possible before.

With the company shifting the focus to health, there has absolutely been a similar shift in terms of who's working on it. It's not just lip service, where it's like, "Yeah, we really care about health as a company." We care about health. It's the top priority. If you look at the [objectives and key results] for the company, you see health called out as this is what we are going to get right.

Louise Matsakis: How are you anticipating or thinking about enforcing the dehumanizing speech policy when it goes into effect? What kinds of resources and mechanisms will be used to ensure that dehumanizing speech that does violate Twitter's rules is removed?

Del Harvey: Obviously we're continuing to try to improve how our reporting process works, if we get reports, the context that we have from those reports. Right now, we rely pretty heavily on reports to identify potential violations of Twitter's rules. We are exploring how, along with all of the more nuanced enforcement options, we can further expand our user behavioral signals to try to identify and take action on violations more quickly. And then if we get it wrong, have that appeals process that helps people tell us exactly how and why we got it wrong and what we can do.

We're also thinking about how we can do more in terms of transparency around helping people understand when something isn't a violation, why it isn't a violation. Something we have been thinking about is how we can develop more resources for people to understand what a violation looks like and what a violation is not and here's what's different about the two. So that people can have that better understanding and we're quite frankly doing a better job of meeting people's expectations.

Louise Matsakis: I think it's interesting to hear you say words like "rehabilitate" and these words that actually put you into the shoes of the person who's actually violating the rules and figuring out how to make their experience better. It's an important part of the puzzle that's not always talked about. Obviously the person who is being abused should be the first priority, but it's interesting to think about, how do you prevent people from breaking the rules in the future? How did you develop that perspective?

Del Harvey: The first thing I would say is obviously when it comes to the person who's actually being targeted, we want to make sure they understand what recourse they have, how we can help them, how we can make sure they get to a good place. But the vast majority of people, we've found, aren't deliberately breaking our rules. A lot of times people maybe just didn't even know that [something] violated our rules, or maybe got into an argument that got too heated, or maybe got a little carried away. We've found that 65 percent of people [who had their account functionality limited for a rule violation] weren't in that state again, which is crazy if you think about it.

Again, the challenge of context collapse comes in with people who violate our rules, too. They maybe didn't mean to violate the rules, but context collapse meant that it ended up violating our rules because all parties involved weren't on the same page. We can really shift to focusing on trying to get people to understand what our rules are, how we enforce them, what the consequences are of violating them, and what the pathway back to good is. And then for that really small subset of deliberate bad actors who are absolutely trying to break our rules and are not going to care about education and rehabilitation, that's again where the more nuanced enforcement approach comes into play. We don't need to give them the opportunity to prove that they can be a good citizen if they've already demonstrated that there is no good faith willingness to engage there.

Louise Matsakis: It makes sense to rehabilitate people and to go through a process where you inform them about what's going on. I think that can be really difficult, though, if you have a really high-profile person, or the speech is really newsworthy. After this policy goes into place, what would happen were President Trump to make a comment like the one he made in May, when he compared some immigrants to animals? What would happen if you have a kind of newsworthy situation like that, but it conflicts with the dehumanizing speech policy? You can't necessarily not let the president tweet for 12 hours or something. What would happen in that situation theoretically?

Del Harvey: I mean, it's tough to comment on hypotheticals. But quite frankly I think that part of what we are going to be exploring within the comment period is also people's feedback on that very question. Where do they see communication as being helpful here to help people understand what action we did or did not take? Where should we be exploring expanding those enforcement options and where is the right balance? I don't think we have a concrete answer, in part because it's tough for a hypothetical. It's not something where it's set in stone and it's something we're going to be continuing to explore. You know we also are very much thinking about how we balance that against how people experience the platform as a whole.

TWITTER RELEASES NEW POLICY ON 'DEHUMANIZING SPEECH'

 HOTLITTLEPOTATO

Twitter on Tuesday announced a new policy addressing “dehumanizing speech,” which will take effect later this year, and for the first time the public will be able to formally provide the company with feedback on the proposed rule.

The policy will prohibit “content that dehumanizes others based on their membership in an identifiable group, even when the material does not include a direct target.” It expands upon Twitter’s existing hateful conduct policy prohibiting users from threatening violence or directly attacking a specific individual on the basis of characteristics such as race, sexual orientation, or gender. Twitter’s users, especially women and minority groups, long have complained that the company’s rules have been ineffective and inconsistent in addressing harassment and abuse.

“We obviously get reports from people about content that they believe violates our rules that does not. The dehumanizing content and the dehumanizing behavior is one of the areas that really makes up a significant chunk of those reports,” says Del Harvey, Twitter’s vice president of trust and safety. She adds that many Twitter users, as well as researchers who study dehumanizing speech’s real-world effects, told the company allowing that content to stay was “deeply problematic.”

Susan Benesch, whose research Twitter cites in its announcement, defines dehumanizing speech as “describing other people in ways that deny or diminish their humanity,” like comparing them to insects, demons, or bacteria. The Dangerous Speech Project she founded and directs argues that it’s one hallmark of a wider category called “dangerous speech,” which covers any form of expression that can increase the risk that an audience will participate in or accept violence against another person or group.

“Dehumanization is important since it leads to real harm; it’s just challenging to define precisely, and it’s critical to protect freedom of speech as well,” says Benesch. “This initiative shows that Twitter staff are thinking hard about the variety of offline harms to which online content can lead, and trying to reduce them. It’s easiest for platforms to respond to more obvious forms of harm, such as a credible threat of violence directed at a named, specific person.”

Previously on Twitter, a comment like “all women are scum and should die” would need to be targeted at an individual to break Twitter’s rules. The new policy would remove the requirement that a user who is potentially a member of the protected class be referenced or discussed in the tweet itself.

News that Twitter was considering a policy on dehumanizing speech first broke in August, as major tech companies like YouTube and Facebook moved to ban conspiracy theorist Alex Jones from their platforms. Twitter initially declined to follow suit, and CEO Jack Dorsey defended his company's decision by arguing that Jones had not broken the rules. (Media outlets like CNN went on to point out multiple instances where Jones did appear to violate Twitter policies.) After the judgment caused an uproar at Twitter, Harvey sent an email to staff that she was "shifting our timeline forward for reviewing the dehumanization policy."

Twitter is giving users two weeks to comment on the new rule via a survey form; questions include whether the policy is clear and how it could be improved. It will be available in English, Spanish, Arabic, and Japanese.

"Historically we have been less transparent than, quite frankly, I think is ideal about our policies and how we develop them," says Harvey, who has worked at the company for more than a decade. "Our hope is that actually having this feedback period will serve to bring people sort of along with us on the process."

Twitter also has a so-called Trust and Safety Council, made up of third-party nonprofits and other organizations that are consulted on new policies. The company will process the feedback and then continue its normal internal procedure for new rules.

After the dehumanizing speech statute becomes a permanent part of Twitter's rules, the hardest work of actually enforcing it will begin. Unlike, say, a cryptocurrency scam, dehumanizing speech might be difficult to spot—in part because it's dependent on context and hard to exactly define.

“Not all dangerous speech has dehumanizing language, and not all comparisons of human beings with animals are dehumanizing,” says Benesch. “Twitter and other platforms should be careful not to define dehumanization too broadly. For example, it’s tempting to say that any demeaning remark about a group of people, such as ‘the X people are all thieves’ or ‘all corrupt’ is dehumanizing. That one is not dehumanizing, since corruption is a specialty of humans.”

Recent real-world incidents have proved challenging for other social media companies to police effectively. Facebook, for instance, has been accused of helping to facilitate the Muslim Rohingya crisis in Myanmar, which the UN is now calling to prosecute as genocide. Buddhist leaders in the country used the platform to spread misinformation and hate speech, including comparing Rohingya to dogs and pests. (Facebook already prohibits users from publishing “violent or dehumanizing speech.”)

Twitter’s new policy is part of a greater soul-searching initiative the company announced in March, after it was widely criticized for allowing misinformation and automated bots to flourish on its platform during the lead-up to the 2016 US presidential election. Since then, Twitter has limited the influence of suspicious accounts, deleted more than 140,000 third-party apps that violated its policies, and begun hiding tweets from potentially harmful users, among other efforts.

The fight against dehumanizing speech is only the latest part of that effort. Hate groups that use the platform to spread their messages would likely be impacted, for example, even if they're not harassing a specific individual. But a rule against dehumanization won't help in circumstances where harassment is facilitated through lying or misinformation. Conspiracy theorist Alex Jones' claims that school shootings never happened wouldn't necessarily be addressed by the policy, but they're still extremely harmful nonetheless.

What's more, Twitter may need to decide what to do about high-profile users like President Donald Trump, who once tweeted that Democrats want illegal immigrants "to pour into and infest our Country." The company historically has allowed for world leaders whose statements may violate policies but also are newsworthy. "It's not something where it's set in stone," says Harvey. "It's something we're going to be continuing to explore."

Twitter releases new policy to ban dehumanizing speech

Users have two weeks to weigh in on the new rule

By Russell Brandom | @russellbrandom | Sep 25, 2018, 10:28am EDT

Illustration by Alex Castro / The Verge

Twitter has released a new moderation policy explicitly banning dehumanizing speech. In a post on Tuesday morning, Twitter executives Del Harvey and Vijaya Gadde described the proposed rule as part of an ongoing effort to promote healthy conversations on Twitter and limit real-world harms stemming from discourse on the platform.

“Language that makes someone less than human can have repercussions off the service, including normalizing serious violence,” the post reads.

Once the new change is in effect, a new clause will be added to the Twitter Rules: “You may not dehumanize anyone based on membership in an identifiable group, as this speech can lead to offline harm.” The policy then defines dehumanization:

Dehumanization: Language that treats others as less than human. Dehumanization can occur when others are denied of human qualities (animalistic dehumanization) or when others are denied of human nature (mechanistic dehumanization). Examples can include comparing groups to animals and viruses (animalistic), or reducing groups to their genitalia (mechanistic).

Identifiable group: Any group of people that can be distinguished by their shared characteristics such as their race, ethnicity, national origin, sexual orientation, gender, gender identity, religious affiliation, age, disability, serious disease, occupation, political beliefs, location, or social practices.

As noted in the post, the new rules have some overlap with more common provisions against hate speech or racism, but these can be applied to all groups rather than just specific protected classes. In the past, Facebook has drawn criticism for moderation rules that treated racial comments as objectionable only when dealing with race in isolation. Under the resulting rules, additional modifiers created loopholes, which allowed speech against black children but not white men. An explicit policy on dehumanizing speech could also address situations where social networks have fueled racial violence, as in Myanmar, Sri Lanka, and other countries. WhatsApp recently hired thousands of offshore moderators to improve enforcement, but it has not changed its policies on acceptable speech.

Twitter is hosting an open comment period on the rule before it goes into effect, a practice seemingly modeled after the US federal rule-making process. Users with opinions or concerns about the new rule are encouraged to submit concerns or “examples of speech that contributes to a healthy conversation, but may violate this policy.” The comment period will remain open until the morning of October 9th.

Twitter CEO explains 'time-out' for Alex Jones

Twitter wants to weed out dehumanizing language on its platform -- but before it rolls out a policy change, it is asking the public for feedback.

The company acknowledged on Tuesday that its current rules fall short of addressing some abusive tweets that may not fall under its ban on "hateful conduct." The "hateful conduct" policy prohibits users from making direct attacks or threats against people on the basis of considerations like race, ethnicity, sexual orientation, or gender, for example, but it doesn't necessarily also encompass tweets that dehumanize users in different ways.

In a blog post, Twitter explained "dehumanizing language" by citing scholars like Susan Benesch who explain that dehumanization includes referring to people as things such as insects, despised animals, bacteria, and more. Such speech could also have offline repercussions.

"This can make violence seem acceptable: if people seem like cockroaches or microbes, it's okay to get rid of them," writes Benesch, a faculty associate of the Berkman Center for Internet and Society at Harvard University, in a description of "dehumanizing language" on the Dangerous Speech Project website where she is a director.

But before it updates its rules, the company is first soliciting feedback from the general public. In the blog post, Twitter included a survey, which will be live until October 9, for individuals to weigh in on the proposed policy update.

The company said its policy team is working closely with local non-governmental organizations and policy makers as well.

The proactive outreach to users ahead of a policy update is part of a recent attempt on Twitter's part to be more forthcoming about the issue of abuse on its platform.

The company has long been criticized for its whack-a-mole system for removing content and dealing with abuse. It has struggled with how to moderate its platform without infringing on freedom of speech, and with doing so in a transparent way.

In July, Twitter hired researchers to study the "health" of its "discourse."

"Health" has been a buzz word at the company lately. The company has cracked down on fake accounts, purged suspicious accounts from users' follower metrics and removed apps that violated its policies.

Dorsey has said that his team is focused on cracking down on harassment and hate speech. In an interview with CNN in August, Dorsey said "we are taking a lot more action than we ever have in the past." But much of the work is invisible to users, he said, at least in the short term.

Twitter to prohibit 'dehumanizing language' in new rules

Share on Facebook Share Tweet on Twitter Share Share

We happen to know a certain Twitter user who really enjoys using dehumanizing language.

Call it the Alex Jones effect.

Twitter announced on Tuesday that it will update its rules to prohibit "dehumanizing language" on the platform. While it is still finalizing what this policy will look like through user feedback and internal review processes, this initiative could add a much-needed layer of clarity to Twitter's sometimes opaque, yet narrow, rule violation policy.

"We want to expand our hateful conduct policy to include content that dehumanizes others based on their membership in an identifiable group, even when the material does not include a direct target," Twitter's Vijaya Gadde and Del Harvey wrote in a blog post.

Twitter defines dehumanizing language as speech that denies people of human qualities through malicious comparisons to animals or objects. It cites research that links dehumanizing speech to real-world violence.

SEE ALSO: From Milo to Alex Jones: What is Twitter CEO Jack Dorsey doing?

The policy has reportedly been in the works for the past three months, and it's part of the company's larger initiative to "improve conversational health" on the platform. Twitter is still actively working to define what "conversational health" actually means. But it has already taken several proactive steps that have shown a marked difference in decreasing trolling and bullying on the platform.

Encouragingly, Twitter is basing its dehumanizing language policy on academic research that shows the real world effect that demeaning people through dehumanization can have. For example, speech that equates a group with an animal or object is a "hallmark of dangerous speech, because it can make violence seem acceptable."

Twitter users will have until Tuesday, October 9, at 6:00am PST to provide Twitter with feedback on the policy (you can do so here). Twitter then plans to update the rules "later this year."

It's difficult not to draw a connection between this new policy and the back-and-forth controversy surrounding Twitter's eventual banning of Alex Jones. During that time, many criticized the way that Twitter was applying its hate speech policy to Jones; that is, it wasn't. This new policy further defines the kind of speech disallowed by twitter, and broadens the scope of harmful speech beyond needing to include an individual "@." Harvey and Gadde indeed addressed this need for further elucidation.

"There are still Tweets many people consider to be abusive, even when they do not break our rules," the authors write. "Better addressing this gap is part of our work to serve a healthy public conversation."

Mashable has reached out to Twitter to ask whether this policy will be enforceable retroactively, or if it will only apply going forward. We happen to know a certain Twitter user who enjoys comparing women to dogs to whom this new policy might apply.

A crazy-cool new printer could change the way we print human tissue

KEVIN URGILES / 15 DAYS AGO

Researchers at Harvard's School of Engineering and Applied Sciences developed a new printing technique that allows them to manipulate the size of liquid drops with sound waves. That may not seem revolutionary at first glance, but it actually opens the door to a world where human tissue manufacturing is easier than ever. Here's how it works.
